Social Media: LiveJournal

While Twitter and Facebook are social media sites that are traditionally seen as driving traffic, lots of smaller sites exist with active blogging communities. One such site is LiveJournal.

While no one was linking to Wikinews articles on LiveJournal in posts or comments, links to classification articles were posted once each in journals owned by aigantighe and mancunian. aigantighe is from New Zealand and their journal is watched by 105 people. Mancunian is from the United Kingdom and their journal is watched by over 1,000 people. Miumau is the only person to link to an article about a 2012 Australian Paralympian. Their journal is watched by over 27,000 people.

Social Media: Google+

The Google+ community has a different type of community than the one on Twitter, attracting a community that is a bit more tech savvy and elitist. Because of this, they generally do not link to Wikipedia. The community on the site was not much interested in Australia and the Paralympics either, with only 19 comments using both keywords.

A few HOPAU connected articles have been translated into other languages. Found in the list above, classification articles have not been done in other languages. Efforts have been made to reach out to Dutch and Portuguese speaking Wikipedia contributors to get them to translate or create these articles in their own language but so far with little success.

Several articles related to Australia at the 2012 Summer Paralympics exist in other languages, with athletics, cycling and swimming being the most popular articles. Articles about male Paralympians are more likely to be translated by a ratio of 6:5. When the articles created by Laura Hale on simple are subtracted, the ratio is 5:3.

Wikipedia: Did You Know

When combined, the Did You Know articles had 66,367 views, accounting for 16.1% of all views to 2012 Australian Paralympian views during the Games period. The most popular Did You Know was Chris Bond (wheelchair rugby), which received twice as many views as the second most popular Did You Know, likely because it included a picture. The second most popular Did You Know was Kayla Clarke and also included a picture.

34 articles about male Australian Paralympians appeared at DYK compared to 25 about female Australian Paralympians. The gender disparity was partly a result of editor burnout, which resulted in articles of lower quality and ineligible for Did You Know. Another factor was Australia appears to have sent more male Paralympians to the Games than females.

Amongst the most popular DYKs, six of the top ten featured female Australian Paralympians.

Australia at the 2012 Summer Paralympics

One of the goals of the project was to maintain the article about Australia at the 2012 Summer Paralympics during the Games period. Australia has a much smaller editing community and was not hosting the Games, which meant article about Great Britain was often updated faster and had more people working on it. Nine editors made most of the edits to the article during the Games period.

Wikipedia: Australia at the 2012 Summer Paralympics

Of the thirteen human editors who made changes to the article, eight are affiliated with the HOPAU project. Six anonymous editors made one edit each. Five of these editors were from Australia, and one was from the United Kingdom.

The average edit added 262 bytes of content, median edit added 54 bytes of content and mode edit made zero additions of new content.

5 bot edits were made, 4 of them making interwiki link fixes to the article in other languages. 8 edits were made using user run scripts, with three of these script assisted edits being made during the Games.

Wikipedia: Article feedback

The table below gives a better idea of where comments on articles are geographically coming from based on the article type, Australian Paralympian or classification, and the sex of the Australian Paralympian.

| Location | Australia | Classification | Male | Female |
|-------------------|-----------|----------------|------|--------|
| Australia | 1 | 0 | 0 | 1 |
| New South Wales | 12 | 0 | 8 | 4 |
| Queensland | 2 | 0 | 1 | 1 |

| Canada | 0 | 1 | 0 | 0 |
| Mexico | 1 | 0 | 0 | 1 |
| United Kingdom | 2 | 1 | 0 | 2 |

Classification questions from entirely from outside Australia. IP addresses from New South Wales used the feedback tool most, giving feedback by a 2:1 ratio for male:female articles. Queensland, which gave a sixth of the feedback, had an even gender split in leaving comments. Western Australia, Tasmania and Victoria all only asked questions about male competitors, whereas Mexico and the United Kingdom left feedback exclusively on female competitors.

Commons

In the lead up to London, the Australian Paralympic Committee uploaded a large number of images. Beyond that, people involved with the project uploaded images including LauraHale and Bidgee. A few of these images have been identified as quality images on Commons including the ones below. One image taken by a participant was used in a television broadcast about the men's wheelchiar basketball team in the lead up to London.

Images uploaded as a result of the project are found on at least 274 pages found on 22 Wikimedia projects. The table below gives an idea as to how many pages by project uses images connected to the project. Counting for a project stops at 100 for the tool used. The list of images looked at was not complete, so numbers are likely higher.

German Wikipedia used images during London for use on articles about the Solomon Islands and Vanuatu at the 2012 Summer Paralympics articles. The profile picture of Jacqueline Freney was used on Sommer-Paralympics 2012, the main article about the Games. This article was viewed 143434 times during the previous 30 days as of 13 September.

The Oceania Paralympics images were also used on several pages on French Wikipedia for country specific Games articles. Images from the Rollers & Gliders World Challenge appear on articles about wheelchair basketball at the Paralympics, the Great Britain men's team, and the Australian men and women's teams.

Spanish Wikipedia uses the team profile image of Greg Smith for their article about him.

The audio interview of Trischa Zorn and connected picture were used on at least three different language Wikipedias, including English, Italian and Portuguese.

Many images were across Wikinews articles, including news articles about the Rollers & Gliders World Challenge, London Paralympic articles original reporting, a press conference in Canberra before the Games and more.
